Opinion text based on the documentary

Cyberbunker: Rede Obscura na Alemanha (2023)

After having watched the documentary “Cyberbunker: The Criminal Underworld” in the classroom, I admit that the utopia of living in a bunker where the people I am friends with and/or work with could have the freedom to live our lives peacefully and work independently and remotely by the countryside whilst being connected to the entire world sounds very appealing. Mainly because of the state of this world right now and the dangers that may be ahead of us, geopolitically and environmentally speaking. But the extent to which that group of people went to (Xennt and company), to have no criteria to what their servers would host, and to not care if their enterprise was being used to cause very serious harm – or even death – to people across the globe, that lack of principles and rules goes absolutely against my morals.

But, at the same time, I don't know if I would've had the courage or skill to act upon it immediately, or against them, especially not on my own. If I worked as a network technician or system administrator and was part of a company like Xennt's since its beginning, and if I found out that the infrastructure I managed was being used for major illegal activities, I would have to be very careful about my next steps. I guess I would try to gather as much proof as I could of the data that could incriminate them most in court, and try to get out of the company as fast as possible, all the while seeking protection from the authorities and maybe leaking some of that information to the media so that my actions would be somewhat backed by public opinion and the authorities as well (much like Edward Snowden did in his time working for the NSA and after).
